INTRODUCTION

Eggs that consumers buy in the supermarket or that food companies use in their products come from two types of hens: caged hens or cage-free hens. Cage-free eggs, as their name suggests, are laid by hens who live in cage-free environments, including barn and free-range hens. Cage-free laying hens can move around freely and engage in natural behaviors such as feeding, laying, resting, and dust-bathing, and can also make nests and fly. Dozens of peer-reviewed scientific studies have found that hens raised outside of cages produce eggs with far greater food safety, higher nutritional value, and quality.

Today's consumers are increasingly conscious of their food choices and are shifting their interest and purchases toward products that are more sustainable and healthy. As a result, an increasing number of food companies have committed to using only cage-free eggs. In 2020, the Philippines' Bureau of Agriculture and Fisheries Standards developed a comprehensive set of animal welfare guidelines for cage-free eggs in response to the growth in interest in the sector. In the west, nearly all major retailers, restaurant chains, food service companies, and packaged food brands had set a timeline for shifting to use only cage-free eggs across their supply chains. The shift to using cage-free eggs has been particularly fast across the hospitality and restaurant groups, including in the Philippines.

SUMMARY OF SCORECARD'S FINDINGS

The 2024 Philippines Restaurant Industry Cage-Free Scorecard shows the current position of top restaurant brands in the country on this key sustainability, animal welfare and food safety issue.
